Methods:

1. Find information that is based on our main question.
2. Look for facts that are true.

WHAT MAKES A PERSON A PSYCHOPATH?

Something that makes a person have a degree of psychopathy is that areas of the brain (e.g, amygdala, insula, etc.) show less or reduced activity in people that have psychopathic characteristics when they see people who are in sorrow or when they try to learn consequences of their actions. The damaged functioning of those areas in the brain affects the abilities of people.

FUN FACTS!

- Female psychopaths are different than male psychopaths.

Female psychopaths appear more open to anxiety, emotional problems, etc. than male psychopaths.

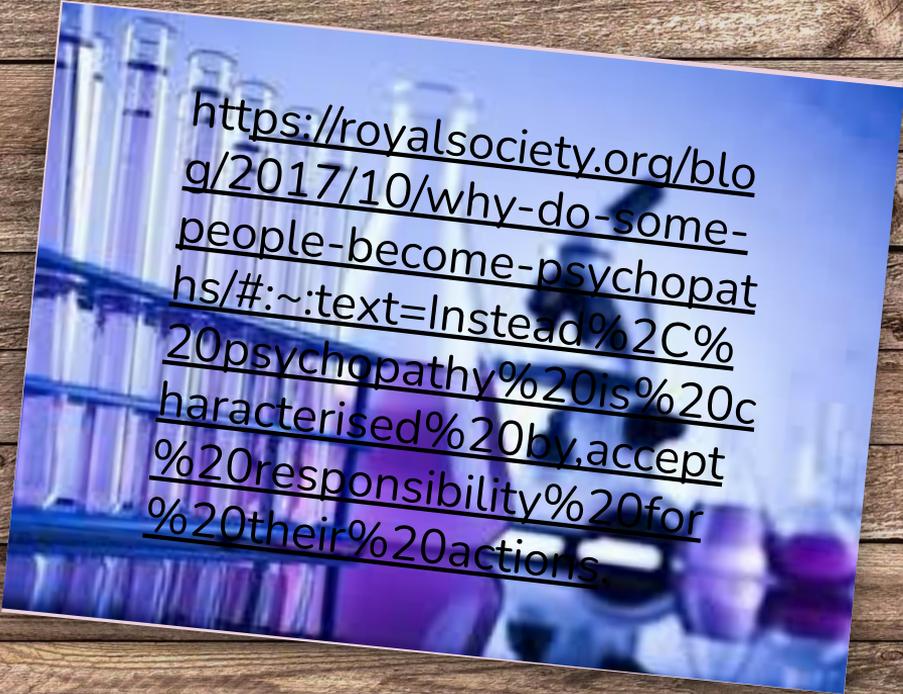

- A person who has a level of psychopathy have little to consider for safety issues, especially for other people's safety.

- Don't experience true emotions, but can mimic other people's emotions.

- People who have to deal with psychopathy don't care about any other responsibility for hurting other people's feelings.

Psychopaths think that rules and laws don't apply to them.
